He advised her to accept £200, and said that if at the end of the season she was still in want of funds, and it was not sold, he would give £150 for it, though he did not actually want the article. Mr. Huddleston then called Mrs Blakeley, whose appearance in the witness box excited considerable interest. The Lord Chief Baron appealed to the learned counsel to consider whether the lady should not he spared enumination. A long discussion then took place between the Lord Chief Baron and the learned counsel, in the course of which his lordship suggested that the opinion of the jury might be taken without any further evidence being given.

A Juryman: We are perfectly agreed; we think there was no sale. The Lord Chief Baron: If that is your opinion there is an end of the case, and the defendants are entitled to the verdict. A verdict was then entered for the defendants, and Mrs Blakeley, who had only given her name, after having been sworn, left the box.
